The \$64000 Question set the pattern for countless other television game shows, but was eventually taken off the air in 1958. It had real people winning incredible sums of money while audiences tested their own knowledge and intelligence and, more importantly, empathized with the triumphs and tragedies of each of the contestants. In that sense, it was also the predecessor of the reality shows that many people still love to watch today.

B

The \$64000 Question, which began in 1955, was the first really big television game show. It attracted big audiences in the United States and everywhere else it was shown. It counted among its winners a housewife, an eleven-year-old boy, a jockey, a shoemaker, a policeman and a psychiatrist named Dr Joyce Brothers, who later had her own television programme giving advice to viewers.

C

Inside their rooms, the contestants could not hear the nervous audience's reactions and whispered speculation about the answers. The TV cameras always focused on the players' anxious faces as they tried to find the answer to the question. If they managed to answer correctly, they came back to the show the following week to answer a question at the next highest level. There was only one question per contestant in each episode of the programme.

D

The show was really little more than a television version of a 1940s radio programme called The \$64000 Dollar Question. Contestants who believed themselves to be experts in particular categories answered questions on their chosen field. The more questions they answered, the more money they could potentially win, but the questions got more difficult at each level. For the highest level questions, players were escorted to "Isolation Rooms" by pretty assistants.
