cradle but baby Hercules strangled them between his two fingers until they died. Hercules grew stronger everyday but even as a young man he did not know that he had such great strength.

Alcomena, his mother, and the king of Thebes wanted Hercules to study music and sculpture. But he liked best to learn wrestling and archery. One day, while learning to play the lyre, he plucked the wrong string. His music teacher scolded him. Hercules was embarrassed so he banged the lyre on his teacher's head. This killed the man instantly. The King of Thebes was so angry that he told Alcomena that Hercules must be sent to the forest. There he could use his great strength on the wild beasts.

While in the forest of Thebes, Hercules killed the wolves and the lions that roamed on the countryside. He went back to Thebes and the king and the people welcomed him as a hero.

He was rewarded with Princess Megara's hand in marriage. A big wedding was held which was attended by the shepherds he had saved from the beasts.

Princess Megara bore him two beautiful children who became the pride of their grandparents. When Hera, the wife of Jupiter, heard about this, she became envious. She used her power to remove Hercules' right senses. She turned him into a madman.

While Hercules was walking in the garden, his children quarreled. He, being out of his senses, joined the quarrel strangling his children to death. It was at this point that Hera returned his right senses. He was aggrieved upon knowing what he had done. He asked God for forgiveness. As a punishment, he became a slave.
