It's Raining Iguanas!

Few years ago, I visited relatives in South Florida. Temperatures were (1) considerably/precisely lower than usual but not cold enough to keep is inside. One day, as I was walking down the street with my cousin Todd, something fell out of a tree and almost hit me! I looked down and saw an iguana lying completely (2) constant/still on the ground. "Don't worry," said Todd, "It's not dead." But when he (3) adjusted/reached out to touch it, it didn't move at all. Todd explained that iguanas are cold-blooded animals and have difficulty keeping warm when the weather gets cold. In order to (4) control/aim their body temperature, they stop moving and fall asleep. During this time, it's impossible for them to (5) overlook/grasp the branches of a tree, so they simply fall to the ground! We moved the iguana away from the road as a safety (6) expedition/precaution and Todd explained to me that it would just be a (7) matter/case of time before the sun came out and warmed up the iguana. Then it would wake up. He also told me that Florida isn't the natural (8) habitat/scenery of these animals. Maybe that's why they can't cope when it gets cold.
