Crafts aren't just for grandmothers anymore. Whereas knitting and sewing used to be the work of family women, young people everywhere are taking up crafts as a way to express themselves creatively and to take a stand against mass consumerism. Nowadays, you'll see fashionably dressed young men and women gathering at cafés to sip coffee and knit together. In other words, crafts have become cool.

The popular website craftster.org is a great resource for those who love to make things, and people from all over the world post photos of their crafts, often with step-by-step instructions for others. There are also thousands of blogs that feature photographs of handmade items, blogs by the people who make them, and tips and resources for crafters.

These craft blogs were mostly started by women, but also by some men who wanted to share creative ideas with a wider audience. They cover every conceivable type of craft, from hand-sewn clothing to papermaking and bookbinding, to amigurumi (Japanese crocheted dolls), to lamp making. Many of the blogs have a large readership, and on any given day, some blogs attract hundreds of comments from readers.

Our grandmothers and great-grandmothers never would have dreamed that their old-fashioned skills would be showcased by stylish and trendy young people . . . on the Internet!
