Firefighters have stressful jobs and often put their lives at risk. They put out fires that have got out of control and rescue people from burning buildings and vehicles. They also do a lot to protect the environment by fighting forest fires. They help prevent forest fires, too. In some cases, firefighters may help animals trapped in a forest fire and even jump from an airplane using a parachute to get to areas fire engines cannot reach. Their main goal is to put out fires quickly before they spread and cause greater damage.

People can start fires by being careless. If, for example, they forget to put out a camp fire properly or throw a lighted cigarette out of a car window. Not only are beautiful forests destroyed in this way but human life is put at risk, too. Fortunately, it is rare for firefighters to lose their lives. This is because they are very careful and take precautions. They are very fit and healthy, work in teams and carry special equipment.

Many cooks follow recipes, but sometimes they don't and they invent wonderful food by accident. Here are two examples of food that were discovered by mistake.

2 ☐

Ruth Wakefield invented chocolate chip cookies in 1930. She didn't plan to invent a cookie that would be America's favourite. While Ruth was making some cookies she realised that she didn't have any 'baker's chocolate'. So she broke a chocolate bar into small pieces and added them to the mixture. When the cookies were ready, Ruth was surprised to see that the chocolate pieces had not melted. They weren't chocolate cookies, but chocolate chip cookies!

3 ☐

Potato chips happened by accident as well. In 1853, a customer in a restaurant asked the cook to slice his potatoes very thin and to cook them for a long time. The chef cooked them until they were crispy. The customer was so happy that he ordered more and more. Other people soon began ordering this new crispy potato, too. Potato chips are now popular all around the world.
