"Phubbing" — snubbing _____ you're talking to to look at a cell phone — may not be part of your everyday _____, but it's almost certainly part of your everyday _____. Just think about how often a conversation stalls because your friends (or you) have _____ a phone and descended into an Instagram black hole. The phenomenon may seem like a relatively harmless, if annoying, part of _____ life, but research is finding that it may be hurting your relationships. "Ironically, phubbing is meant to connect you, presumably, with someone through _____ or texting," says Emma Seppälä, a psychologist at Stanford and Yale universities and author of the Happiness Track. "But it actually can _____ disrupt your present-moment, in-person relationships."
