It was the first time I traveled to South America, and I was surprised by the incredible landscapes in the Lost City in Colombia. My luggage was light because I would have to walk a lot. As soon as I reached Colombia, I was attracted by the mystery of the 'Lost City' ruins, which are thought to be older than Peru's Machu Picchu.

After five days of adventure on the coast, which included recovering from an illness, I waved goodbye to some friends in Santa Marta as I set off on a four-day walk to the Lost City. I joined a group of strong explorers and their guide, Hernan. I was the only one who walked very slowly. However, that did not stop me moving with the group up the magic mountain range. Almost three days of walking for nine hours a day is part of this adventure, trust me, it's totally worth the sore legs!

We stopped to dive into cool pools and were impressed by blue butterflies, some of the biggest in the world, which accompanied us during the journey. At every camp, we ate fresh pineapple and oranges. The camps along the way appeared like illusions in the hot desert after a long day's walk. But the best of all was the three-course meal on the menu every night, thanks to the efforts of chefs who climbed on ahead to get it ready.

The people who were born there see themselves as guardians of the planet, and that's great! We cannot offer them anything of importance since they have everything they need. Both adults and children show their happiness by being polite with tourists; the children exchange a photo for chocolates.

120. What is the writer doing in this article?

- A. warning tourists of the dangers of illnesses in Santa Marta.
- B. showing how interesting an expedition to the Lost City can be.
- C. encouraging readers to visit her friends in Santa Marta.
- D. comparing the size of Machu Picchu with that of the Lost City.

121. When describing the first part of her journey, the writer thinks that

- A. the tour guide was the strongest in the group.
- B. the coast weather cured her illness.
- C. walking was the most valuable adventure for her.
- D. moving slowly was the only way to cross the mountain.

122. In paragraph 3, the writer says that she

- A. really enjoyed the sunny, hot weather there.
- B. was grateful to chefs who had dinner prepared on time.
- C. was an expert on the natural world, especially on butterflies.
- D. refused to eat oranges and pineapple while walking.

123. Regarding the local people, the writer

- A. prefers children's behavior to adults' behavior.
- B. feels amazed by the way they feel they protect the planet.
- C. considers she deserves a photo of herself with everyone.
- D. thinks that children are the ones who should protect the environment.

124. Which of the following could be a note for tourists?

A. Be prepared to be delighted by this magnificent place full of natural surprises.

C. Feel free to put all the personal things you may need into your backpack.

B. This fantastic plan requires only curious, healthy, and brave explorers.

D. This is an incredible opportunity to taste a few typical snacks from this region.

Writers

I'm Mike Darvy, a journalist, and in my articles I discuss how difficult it is to write. Last week, a foreign colleague suggested that I write a document describing the daily activities different writers follow. It immediately made me think about my own routine and Ana Fitzgerald's, a singer famous for writing songs, whose routine was quite different from mine.

Ana's days began at 4 am, weekdays and weekends. Her alarm clock had a loud ring so she could hear it. She spent half the day playing jazz and taking short notes. At 1 pm., after lunchtime, she wrote lots of lines for her songs until 6 pm. Then, she exercised for about two hours while singing her new songs. Her days always ended with a healthy dinner, and she went to bed at 10 pm.

My days are quite different. I don't have a daily plan and I don't use alarms. I usually wake up and see if I have any events for the day. If I'm free, I read the latest news on my cell phone. During the day I just let things happen. Every Friday I visit my cousins; their opinions are quite useful. In the evenings, I go for a walk, which helps me find information that I use in my writings. Then, I write for several hours after midnight. On Sundays, I spend time with my girlfriend at home.
