| 8  | DePaulo discovered that lies were more likely between people who had only just met. | Yes | No |
| 9  | DePaulo realized that the purpose of most lies was to be kind.                      | Yes | No |
| 10 | The researchers in DePaulo's study treated all kinds of lies equally.               | Yes | No |

The Truth about Telling Lies

Leonard Saxe, Ph.D., a psychology expert at Brandeis University, thinks that telling lies has been a part of everyday life for a long time. Yet it is only recently that it has become a topic for discussion among psychologists. Before that, lies were mainly things that religious leaders were concerned about.

As psychologists look more closely at how honest we are, they are discovering that it is surprisingly common to tell lies. In 1996, Bella DePaulo, Ph.D., a former psychologist at the University of Virginia, studied 147 people between the ages of 18 and 71, who had to keep a diary of all the lies they told over a period of a week. The results showed that most people told lies once or twice a day and that some types of relationships involved more lies than others. More untruths were told between teenagers and parents than between complete strangers.

Though some lies can cause problems between people, others may actually make it easier for people to get along well. In DePaulo's group, one in every four of the lies was told to make another person feel better. In fact, lies in which people said they liked someone or something more than they actually did ("Your cakes are the best") were about 10 to 20 times more common than lies in which people said they liked someone less than they really did. When the researchers counted the lies, they didn't include the everyday, polite lies we say to each other, such as, "I'm fine, thanks," when actually we don't feel well, or "No problem!" when really, we are a little annoyed.
