Hachiko was an Akita dog born in Akita prefecture (縣, 日本行政區) on November 10, 1923. In 1924, Hidesaburo Ueno, a professor at the University of Tokyo, adopted Hachiko and formed an unbreakable bond with the dog. At the end of every single day, as Ueno got off at Shibuya station to make his way home, Hachiko would leave the house alone to greet him at the station. This routine went on every day until May of 1925, when Ueno had a cerebral hemorrhage (腦溢血) during a lecture. He died that day.

Hachiko, from that day on, continued for the next nine years to leave the house and wait at the station at the exact time the train was due to arrive. In 1932, an article in the Asahi Newspaper highlighted his loyalty and brought him into the national spotlight, where his faith to his master became an example of devotion to which Japanese children could look up to.

We do not know for sure how Hachiko and Professor Ueno spent their time in the span of 1 year and 4 months that they were together. It is obvious, however, that a strong, unbreakable bond had developed between them so that the dog would spend every day of his life waiting for his master to come back. Hachiko's undying devotion, love and faithfulness definitely deserve our respect.

With dreams of becoming millionaires overnight, people buy lottery tickets to try their luck. They always think that after winning the first prize, they can resign or retire immediately. However, Eric Hong, the general manager of Taiwan Lottery, said that only three out of the 230 billionaire-jackpot winners have chosen to quit. All of the three were engaged in high-risk jobs, including construction and the chemical industry. Plus, the first thing most winners do is keep their identities confidential and keep a low profile. This is because people around the winners usually want them to share the prize, which really gets in their hair.

A few years ago, Eric Hong met a winner who had changed his lifestyle too quickly. He replaced his old car with a luxury sports car, so his neighbors and relatives were suspicious. They called and visited him every day asking for financial support. Eric Hong took the initiative to call him; Hong advised that the winner move to another city to avoid such harassment. After thorough consideration, the winner accepted the suggestion, changed his phone number, and left his hometown.

Believe it or not, according to a number of surveys, 70% of lottery jackpot winners end up declaring bankruptcy. Many of them point out that getting rich in a totally unexpected way may not be a blessing. It becomes obvious that the prize is too large to handle. Therefore, unexpected fortunes may eventually destroy ordinary lives. Years ago, a taxi driver in Pingtung County won a NT$22 million lottery jackpot. To our surprise, he squandered the entire jackpot in less than two years. Later, he made his story public, hoping to warn future prize winners. The advice he gave was that winners should turn to experts with financial management backgrounds to avoid the crisis caused by sudden wealth.
