Studies show that the most common employee complaint is the difficulty of balancing work and family life. Over 75 percent of workers feel that they spend too much time at work and not enough time at home. Recognizing this, a growing number of companies are allowing their employees to work all or part of their work week from home. Known as telecommuting, this benefit has become especially popular with workers who have young children or who have long commutes to work. Mark Sapara telecommutes two days a week for his job at an insurance company. "Before I was allowed to telecommute, I spent three hours a day driving to work. When I got home, my kids were already asleep. Now I can meet the kids after they get home from school. It means a lot to me."

However, it takes special skill to work effectively from a home environment. One of the advantages of working outside the home is that there are fewer interruptions. At home, it's easy to become distracted with household chores like going to the store for a carton of milk or doing the laundry. Unless you are disciplined, you can easily find yourself not accomplishing as much as you need to. People who work in offices have to leave those tasks until they come home in the evening, and people who work from home have to learn to do that, too.
