Anya on the move!

When I was a child, my parents used to take us to the same places on vacation, year after year. After I left home, I'd dream about traveling abroad, visiting exotic countries, going to a different place on each trip, but, somehow, I never did. Now I've decided it is time to change all this – and to share my new adventures with you. Welcome to my new blog!

Nepal

Day 1

After surviving an endless flight, Mark and I arrived, tired and dirty, at Kathmandu Airport late at night. We just wanted to get to our hotel and go to bed, but the way there ended up being a little more complex. The airport was packed with people, and we had to wait for nearly an hour for our luggage. Looking for a taxi wasn't less frustrating. There were so many cars and people that it was tricky to see where the taxis were. When we finally got to the hotel, we couldn't take it anymore – after a quick shower, it was time for bed.

Day 2

We had a wonderful night's sleep, but we woke up to some horrible noises. Our hotel is this beautiful, enormous, historic building, which was sadly a little damaged in the earthquake of 2015. Even now they are still rebuilding parts of it, and it looks like slow progress – and a lot of loud noises in the morning.

But we also experienced our first Nepalese breakfast: plates of fruit, eggs, and several other dishes that looked a little mysterious. But the smells coming from every shiny dish was delicious and we enjoyed every little bit of the food!

After breakfast, we went out in search of a taxi again. This one took us through the streets of Kathmandu, driving through crowds of people, animals and thick dust everywhere. And then, once we had left the city, we went through this spectacular scenery of wide valleys and huge mountains, on the way to Bhaktapur. That is when I realized I had underestimated just how awesome the rest of the world can be!
