The adventures of a travelling food writer

by Sabrina Chase

On a recent trip to London, I decided to visit some exciting new restaurants that are using technology to change the way people dine out. My first stop was at an Italian restaurant in the city centre. When I walked into the restaurant, I was given a tray and a chip card, but I had no idea what to do next! The manager must have noticed my confusion because he came up to me and explained that I could swipe my card at any of the food and drink stations in the restaurant, and that the card would record my order. No waiters necessary! I made my selection and then handed my card to the cashier. Once I'd paid for my meal, I collected it and made my way to the dining area on the second floor. My pasta was absolutely delicious, but, I must admit, I didn't enjoy having to carry my food up two flights of stairs!

On the next night, a friend of mine suggested that we visit her favourite high-tech restaurant. When we arrived, I was surprised to discover that there were no paper menus; instead, the menus were beamed on to the touch screen surface of the table with projectors. All we had to do was tap on our choices with our fingers and wait for the waiters to bring us our meal. The touch screen tabletop also allowed us to change virtual tablecloths and even play games! We had so much fun playing games that we hardly touched our food when it arrived – we really should have told the waiter to give us takeaways instead!

Another restaurant that I visited in London was an Indian restaurant. This restaurant also had touch screen tabletops, as well as another very interesting feature: a webcam which allowed me to see the cooks preparing the food in the kitchen! I was already used to high-tech dining so I was not impressed. I really enjoyed the evening, but I shouldn't have ordered the extra spicy curry - it was a little too hot for me!

On my last day in London, I decided to get some tapas from a Spanish takeaway near my hotel. I had heard that the owners had installed a webcam at the restaurant to allow their customers to view the long lunchtime queue online. This came in very handy for me. While I packed my baggage, I kept an eye on the queue and then raced to the restaurant when the lunchtime rush was over. Without that wonderful webcam, I could have missed my plane!

I really can't wait for my next trip to London – high-tech dining is such fun!
