   a. They fight for territory.
   b. They stay close to their extended families.
   c. They live on their own in a new area far away.
   d. They end contact with members of their extended family.

6. What happens at meetings between different families of gorillas?
   a. It depends on the relationship of the gorillas within each family.
   b. They are always peaceful occasions.
   c. There is always a fight.

THE BONDS BETWEEN THEM

When we think of gorillas, we might think of huge beasts beating their chests in a fearsome display of power. While this type of behavior has certainly been observed, it isn't a fair reflection of these animals' nature. Gorillas are known to be extremely gentle creatures and have complex social groups which are remarkably similar to those of some humans.

Gorillas live in families, just like humans, and spend their days eating and sleeping. They move around their territory eating a wide range of vegetation and need to eat constantly in order to take in enough nutrients to maintain their massive bodies. An adult male can weigh up to 400 pounds, so it needs a huge amount of food each day. When they use up one source of food, they move on to the next.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

Gorilla families range in size and can have as many as 30 members. The leader of the group is the oldest and, normally, the strongest male. He is responsible for protecting the family from danger and leads the group in interaction with other families. With each male there may be several females and many babies. The female gorillas' job is caring for the baby and infant gorillas. However, interaction between fully grown males and their offspring is not rare.

Other examples of social behavior include the use of nests. Gorillas roam around an area and make a new nest each night. Scientists witnessed a mother gorilla make a nest for herself and her babies in order to shelter from the rain. When an older male gorilla came closer, the infants were moved in order to make space for him. He was higher in the social standing of the family but not so high that he could take the adult female's place in the nest she had made.

When males reach a certain age, they distance themselves from the group they grew up amongst and eventually leave to start their own family. Females also leave family groups in order to start a family. They effectively "move out of the family home." However, they are likely to stay in the same area. This may go some way to explaining the peaceful and calm interactions between gorilla groups. DNA testing has shown gorillas from an extended family stay in the same region and are able to recognize each other.
Scientists have witnessed peaceful meetings between different families, with males, females and infants interacting. When the gathering breaks up, the families leave in the same group they arrived.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

Unfortunately, not all meetings are peaceful. There have also been occasions when meetings between different groups have led to violence between male gorillas. However, more often than not violence is avoided and nothing more than threatening looks and movements, and warning growls are practiced. The angry or calm nature of a meeting often depends on the species of gorilla. Mountain gorillas are less likely to meet in large groups as the males prefer to remain separate from their extended families, whereas western gorillas have been witnessed meeting in large groups with no signs of violent behavior.
