When people come together to do something good, it's amazing what they are able to accomplish. For Sumatran rhinos, school children have come to their aid and have raised thousands of dollars as well as international attention to help the rhinos' cause.

Since 2007, the Sumatran rhino population has grown dangerously small: only 100 of them are left in the world. They are killed because of their horns. Some people believe the horns help treat diseases, but this isn't scientifically correct. Conservationists with the International Rhino Foundation (IRF) are trying to protect the rhinos. Because of their work, the first baby rhino was born in captivity<sup>1</sup> in 2012.

A group of parents in New York learned about the IRF and decided they wanted to help as well. They had a fundraiser at their children's school and talked to the principal about doing a project on wildlife conservation. Students drew pictures and wrote a book about the rhinos' habitat, their family groups, and the dangers they face.

When a conservationist from the IRF visited the school, he said, "Hundreds of elementary school kids [in New York] think that saving Sumatran rhinos has to be done. That's inspirational." It truly is inspirational to see these conservationists—IRF workers, school children, and their parents—working together for the good of Sumatran rhinos.

<sup>1</sup> born in captivity: when an animal is not born in the wild but with human help—in a zoo or other special center for animals
