The grizzly bear (Ursus arctos horribilis) is a huge, powerful predator that can be found in North America, Europe and Asia.

Grizzlies have a large hump on their backs and sharp long claws. Grizzlies are solitary animals (they usually live alone) but they do gather in large numbers by rivers when the salmon swims upstream to spawn (lay their eggs).

Grizzlies, also called brown bears, feed mainly on nuts, fruit, leaves and shoots but will also eat rodents, deer and elk.

During the winter, grizzly bears sleep for 5 – 8 months that is why they must eat a lot of food in summer so they can survive. Female grizzlies give birth when they are still sleeping in their den. There are usually two cubs in a litter and they are born blind and hairless. They snuggle into their mother's fur for warmth and start to feed on her milk. When the mother wakes up from her long sleep, she leaves the den with her babies.

Wolves can kill the young bear cubs but mother grizzly bears are very protective of their young so they usually survive. Cubs will stay with their mothers for 3 years until they are ready to feed for themselves.
