The Crow and the Peacock

Once upon a time, a white crow and a white peacock were invited to a wedding. They wanted to look beautiful, so they thought of decorating themselves. The peacock remembered a story about a colourful house in the village, so they decided to use the paint pots left by the workers there.

When they started painting, the peacock wanted to go first. The crow painted the peacock in lovely colors, but when it was the crow's turn, the peacock tricked him. He pretended an eagle was coming, and while the crow was distracted, the peacock knocked the paint pots into the river.

The crow, trusting the peacock, let him paint with the last pot, not realizing he was being painted black. When the crow saw his reflection, he realized he had been tricked and could only make a hoarse cry. That's why crows are black and have a hoarse voice.
