The End of Child Labour?

In the 1860s, as Charles Dickens was writing the last of his novels describing life in industrial Britain, a census[1] of England and Wales showed that an eye-popping 36.9% of boys from 10 to 14 years old worked in textile mills or did other forms of manual labour.

Recently, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) decided to update that statistic, not specifically for Britain but for all of humanity -especially the countries now undergoing their own industrial revolutions. The labour group calculated that there were 218 million child labourers in the world today, or about 13.9% of children from 5 to 17 years old.

Anyhow, the report raises many questions. Firstly, it is based on the statistics of just 17 countries. Some large ones were included, like India and Brazil, but such countries as China and Indonesia were left out, and they have around 1.5 billion people together. Besides they are filled with industries traditionally associated with child labour.

There is another sticky question: what should be defined as child labour? The ILO's report says that around 70% of "child labour" occurs in agriculture, and most of that on family farms. Should a 14-year-old who helps his parents on a family farm be considered a child labourer? Yes, according to the ILO.

In the good old days when farming was mostly done to provide families with food, it was not so clear. But today children on farms are exposed to pesticides and often dangerous chemicals. Farmers often work for large corporations, so children are more employees in a family business than their parents' helpers.

One thing is clear: groups like the International Labour Organisation should devote more effort and more resources to fixing the problem of child labour.
