If you are moving to a new country, you may be worried about adjusting to your new community and losing your family traditions. However, it's crucial to understand that embracing a new culture doesn't require abandoning one's traditions. Balancing both cultures will be essential to maintaining your identity while embracing a new culture. Living in a new country can feel strange and confusing, so what do you do to keep your roots and preserve your heritage?

Keep Constant Communication with Family & Friends

It is vital to keep in touch with friends and family members to stay connected to your old home and heritage. Whether it's to call your mom for your favourite family recipe or your friends to recall memories, keeping in touch with your friends and family can help you preserve your culture.

Join Local Clubs & Associations Tied to Your Culture

Another great way to preserve your heritage in a new country is by joining associations or clubs that connect with your lifestyle and community. These gatherings provide a space to practice and celebrate cultural customs while fostering connections with others who have experienced similar transitions.

Maintain Cultural Tradition by Sharing It with Others

A perfect way to preserve your traditions is to continue practicing them in your new home, whether they are daily habits, celebrations, or food. There is nothing better than sharing the traditions you love with friends or colleagues in your new home. You can do this by bringing homemade treats to your office or hosting traditional events with new friends.

Cyberbullying is a very serious issue affecting not just the young victims, but also the victims' families, the bully, and those who witness instances of cyberbullying. It may be hard to figure out how some words of text on a computer screen can lead to such trauma.

People might think that face-to-face bullying is much worse than cyberbullying since the victims of real-world bullying have more difficulties escaping their tormentors, while a victim of cyberbullying can simply turn off the computer or block a bully on a social media platform. Unfortunately, it's not that simple. Face-to-face bullying can range from simple name-calling to more significant acts of bullying, such as rumor-spreading, harassment, threats, and incidents of physical harm between the victim and a bully (or group of bullies). While victims of real-world bullying can be granted a reprieve when they go home, there's simply no escape from cyberbullying. It doesn't end when the school bell rings. It can continue at any time, throughout all hours of the night, and come in the form of text messages, social media posts, chatroom messages, images and videos that have been altered, and many other digital forms.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

Cyberbullying leaves little opportunity for victims to defend themselves. There are no teachers or parents to see what is happening and intervene to put a stop to it. Cyberbullying can also be anonymous, leaving the victim little recourse to even report the bully to an authority figure. If the victim knows who the bully is and chooses to block them on social media, they can simply create a new account, text, message, or use a friend's account. Kids today are extremely resourceful and savvy with technology. If they are intent on cyberbullying, there's not much a victim can do to stop them.

In essence, cyberbullying is more relentless, crueler, and more damaging than real-world bullying. It is also one of the most significant stressors in a young individual's life.
