The building company *Countryside Residential*s wants to build 66 luxury houses in an area of woodland. Teenager Christiana Tugwell and a small group of friends have been against this proposal for five months. They have a protest camp and they receive support from other residents who want to save the trees and the wildlife. *Countryside Residential*s says they are careful to preserve wildlife and they have employed ecologists to study the area. They also say they are spending a lot of money to protect animal and plant life.

But Christiana and her friends have built underground tunnels. They are going to occupy these tunnels to stop the company from starting work.

'I began organizing the local campaign when I noticed that some locals did not want these new houses,' says Christiana. 'The residents wrote letters to the authorities but there was no answer. So to put more pressure, I started camping on the site. At first, my friends did not want to join me because they hate sleeping on the ground - but I gradually convinced them.'

After the first week, Christiana's mother sent some friends to make her go back home. 'I'm worried about possible violence from the people in the company – but I know she's right,' she says.
