

The Paris Opera House

Work on a new Opera building began in 1862, on the orders of Napoleon III. The building was built in a mixture of different architectural styles, including Renaissance, Baroque and Classical styles. The building is a symbol of the wealth and confidence of France during the Second Empire.

The large ramp¹ on the West side of the building was put there so that the Emperor could drive directly into the main hall of the Opera. Although building started in 1862, a war in 1870 and a fire in 1873 delayed the work, and the Opera did not open until 1875.

The architectural plan of the Opera was just one of the many projects of Baron Haussmann, who was responsible for rebuilding much of central Paris. The architect Charles Garnier was chosen to design this important building, and the Opera House is often called the Garnier Palace. It was a very ambitious project, and the difficulties in building it were enormous. A special underground lake had to be created to make the foundations of the building safe. The underground lake plays an important role in The Phantom of the Opera.

The huge auditorium has five levels, and the stage is the largest in Europe. The facade contains four allegorical groups: Music, Lyric Poetry, Lyric Drama and Dance. Above it there is an enormous dome. In 1964 the ceiling of the Opera was decorated by the Russian-born French painter Marc Chagall, one of the early Surrealists. A huge rococo staircase leads to the large foyer,¹ which is decorated with mosaics and sculptures. The foyer then leads to the various levels of galleries and balconies. Eight tall columns support the great dome above the hall.

The Red Death came to the land of Prince Prospero. When someone became ill with this disease, blood came out of his skin and he died in half an hour. Blood was the distinctive sign of the Red Death. Prince Prospero decided to leave death and disease behind. He and one thousand of his nobility went into one of his castles. They locked all of the doors and waited there for the disease to leave the land.

Inside they all enjoyed themselves and forgot the suffering outside. They held party after party. One evening the prince put on a special masquerade and everybody wore the strangest and most horrible masks. There was a large clock with a pendulum, and each hour it sounded in a disturbing way: then for a short moment, all the people at the party stopped their dancing, eating and immoral activities. Then they began again their wild movements of pleasure and enjoyment.

At midnight this pause in the festivities lasted longer as the clock sounded twelve times. It was then that the people at the party noticed a strange figure in the room. At first they were simply curious, and then they were horrified and disgusted. This was strange because everything was permitted at Prince Prospero's party — a party where there was no right and no wrong.

Now, this stranger was tall and thin, and he wore the clothing that was then worn by the dead in their graves. His mask looked like the dried face of a dead man, and his clothing was all covered with blood, the blood of the Red Death.

Prince Prospero became angry at this bad joke and shouted, 'Who is this man? How can he offend me with this horrible mask?' But no one had the courage to attack the stranger, and the stranger walked slowly through the castle. The prince then ran after him and came to the stranger. He pulled out a knife to kill the stranger, but Prospero screamed and fell to the ground, dead. Then the other people finally attacked the stranger, but they found that there was nothing inside the costume: it was empty.

It was then that everybody knew that the Red Death had arrived secretly. Then each person at the party fell in pain and was dead. The big clock stopped when the last person died. Then the Red Death was the ruler of all.
