Can online friendships be as close as real-life ones? For many people, the answer is 'yes'. Friendship is about understanding someone, showing you care and supporting them when they need help. You can have a good 1 relationship with someone without ever meeting them in person. Online relationships are very similar to real-life ones, and even when you get on really well with someone, it's possible to have problems occasionally. You can 2 upset someone by deliberately being unkind to them or accidentally saying the wrong things. You can have a 3 disagreement about something, whether it is a serious topic like politics or something less important like music, and get 4 hurt with each other. Afterwards, when you have calmed down and are sorry for any 5 hurtful things you wrote or said, you can apologise and ask your friend to 6 forgive you. The only difference is that, when you are online, you can't give your friends a hug when they need one, and that can sometimes make a big difference.

Choose the correct options.

Spencer Sleyon, 1 who/ whose lives in New York, has just flown to Florida to see his best friend, Rosalind Guttman. What's unusual about that? This is the first time they have ever met 2 each other/ themselves in person. What's more, Spencer, 3 which/ who is a twenty-two-year-old rapper, is almost sixty years younger than eighty-one-year-old Rosalind. They met online on an app called Words with Friends, 4 which/ where they played word games together. Spencer, who considers 5 himself/ him a word expert, was impressed with Rosalind's vocabulary. As they played, they started chatting about their lives. When Spencer's friend Amy Butler heard about their friendship, she was determined to get them together. It just goes to show that two people 6 who / whose ages are very different can still get on well together
