Reading (Items1-7) Culture Crash

It's almost thirty years now since Brad Perkins came into our small southern town like an ambulance on its way to a car crash. At the time, he had no idea that anyone had noticed him, but of course we had. He was from New York City, a place where manners, values, and the rules of courtesy were very different from ours. Up North, being direct is something positive. Down here, it's considered rude.

During the years, Brad never realized that he was offending anyone. We now know that he never meant to. Once, Dr. Franklin invited Brad for Sunday dinner, not long after he'd arrived. Although he is actually quite reserved, Dr. Franklin likes to be known around town as a cultured man. He therefore felt the need to welcome Brad to town and show him some southern hospitality. Yet that meal caused such a problem for Brad that he almost had to leave town. Looking back now, I can see that we were the ones who were being rude, and not Brad Perkins.

There were only six people at dinner, but what he did seemed to have been broadcast all over town by the next day. And, of course, everyone took offense. Later, Dr. Franklin agreed that they had gone overboard and had been too sensitive. As a rule, however, it is not customary for a guest to refuse a second helping in a southerner's home.

Brad Perkins will have been here for thirty years next June. We've come to admire him, and it's hard to imagine the place without him. We treat him just like one of us, but I guess we've just gotten used to people from up North. Over the years, we've tried to learn more about what's considered appropriate in the North. We realize now that they're not rude; they just communicate differently.

Conversation (Items 11-16)

Husband: Buster, here boy, Buster.
Wife: What's going on?
Husband: Honey, don't get mad. But there's been a disappearance.
Wife: Disappearance? What do you mean?
Husband: Buster! He's disappeared! I took him for a walk. When we got home, I went to the kitchen to make some coffee, turned around and Buster was gone!
Wife: Gone? How can that be? Did you look for him?
Husband: Of course! I looked all over the house - upstairs and downstairs. I called for him. I whistled for him. He's nowhere to be found.
Wife: I'm really worried! There's a rumor going around about a gang stealing pedigree dogs. Buster is worth a lot of money.
Husband: That's it! The thieves must have broken in while I was making coffee, and stolen Buster! Let's call the police!
Wife: Wait, before you start calling the police... I think I might have a different version of events.
Husband: Really? What's that?
Wife: Well, did you forget to close the back door again? That's what I thought. I'll go around to the neighbors to look for him...
Husband: The evidence is not conclusive! I may be innocent!
