

Aron Ralston is an experienced climber, but one day in 2003, he forgot a few basic rules, and a day in the desert turned into a nightmare that lasted nearly a week. That particular day, he went rock climbing in Blue John Canyon in Utah, U.S. It's a very beautiful place and it's very ¹remote, a long drive from the nearest town. The problems began when he didn't tell anyone where he was going, so nobody knew he was there.

A few hours later, he was climbing in the canyon when suddenly a big rock fell and trapped his right hand against the canyon wall. Trying not to panic, he pulled with his left arm and pushed with his feet, too, but he couldn't move the rock even one centimeter. He was ²stuck and alone, as well.

He had left his phone in his car, so he couldn't call for help. He tried shouting ³loudly, but there was nobody to hear him. In his bag, there was a small bottle of water, two burritos and some chocolate—enough food for a short walk. Waiting for help day after day, he ate his food and drank the water slowly, but no help came. He ⁴realized he was probably going to die and recorded video messages for his family on a camera.

After five days, all of his food and water were gone. That night, he had a strange dream and saw a small boy who was his future son. He woke up at ⁵dawn the following morning and he knew what he had to do. The only way to escape was to cut off his hand.

First, he broke his arm, and then he used a small knife to remove his hand. It took an hour and was extremely painful. He used a small first-aid kit on the ⁶wound, but he was losing a lot of blood. He managed to climb down the canyon and walked slowly toward his car. ⁷Eventually, he met a Dutch family who gave him food and ⁸hurried to find help. Soon after, a helicopter arrived to rescue him.

Aron wrote a book about his experience, and director Danny Boyle made the story into a movie. Seven years after the accident, Aron had a son named Leo, and today he still goes climbing. He also gives talks about his adventure to help other people.■
