The Business of Stealing Art

Art is big business and where there's money to be made, there's crime. There are currently more than 30,000 works of art listed on the international Art Loss Register, and the FBI estimates the market for stolen art to exceed 4.7 billion euros a year.

Recent thefts have shown how easy it can be to take a painting. In October 2012, thieves broke into a Dutch art gallery with state-of-the-art security and stole seven works worth hundreds of millions of euros. In May 2010, a lone thief stole five paintings estimated to be worth 100 million euros in an overnight heist at a Paris museum. In February 2007, two Picasso paintings, worth nearly 50 million euros, and a drawing were stolen from the Paris home of the artist's granddaughter in an overnight robbery. Fortunately, the police recovered the art when the thieves tried to sell it.

While it may be relatively easy to steal art, famous works are notoriously difficult to sell. Stolen paintings that are extremely valuable on the open market can never end up in that market, thus making them both priceless and worthless at the same time. So why steal art in the first place? Thieves know that an art heist can be carried out at low risk of death or injury. Unlike a bank, with its myriad of security measures, museums, galleries and private residences tend to be soft targets. The art is there for the taking.

Once in possession of the art, thieves can sell works to an unscrupulous dealer or collector. While it is not the most common way to offload a well-known work, there are always people willing to buy a stolen masterpiece. However, the thieves know that they will be selling the work for less than 10 percent of market value. When one considers the price of art these days, that is still a respectable sum. The Paris heist, for example, could have netted the thief a cool ten million euros.

If the work is very recognisable, it will never end up on the open market selling for what it is worth. But if the world has given up looking for a lesser-known artefact, a type of art-laundering can take place. The first dealer might sell it quietly for a low price, getting a quick sale to avoid attention. If the painting then changes hands a few times in non-public deals, it can eventually end up at public auction with no red flags going up, since the owner listing it is, in fact, the legitimate owner. If the auction house does not check up on the painting's provenance, it can slip through the cracks.

If the thief does not wish to risk a sale, the work can be held for ransom or returned for the reward money. For a priceless work of art, museums and their insurance companies make it their mission to recover the piece whatever the cost, even if it culminates in the robbers going free. When the Isabella Stewart Gardner museum in Boston was robbed in a $250 million heist, it offered five million dollars for information leading to the paintings' whereabouts. For the insurance company, it can get the art back at a fraction of the original price, which is better than paying the owner the insured value of a work.

Some works have a far worse plight - they are destroyed or discarded. A 1911 painting by Picasso, The Pigeon with Green Peas, was one of the paintings stolen in the 2010 Paris heist. The painting has been lost forever, as the thief threw the fragile painting in a rubbish container shortly after the theft. Unfortunately, the container was emptied before the painting's location was discovered.

Finally, what of the identity of the thieves? Well, romantic Hollywood notions aside, there are no gentleman thieves or cunning cat burglars. The business is now dominated by organised criminal gangs. After drugs and weapons, art theft is the third most lucrative criminal enterprise.
