Reading

1 Read the text about tourism.

In search of real eco-tourism

More and more people know about eco-tourism thanks to traditional and social media. A lot of companies now say they offer sustainable tourism, but how do people know if they are really buying a true eco-friendly holiday?

So, what can people do to check? 1 The main travel booking sites now have 'green' travel options while well-known search engines have flight searches that show you how to offset the environmental cost of your flight. But can you really trust them? Companies pay money to be among the first results of these searches. 2 Even if the holidays are not green, some of these people will buy them.

The answer could be to use travel sites which show they are eco-friendly in other ways. For example, if a site gives most of the money it receives from advertising to forest-planting projects around the world, you can probably trust it. 3 These sites check hotels and campsites to compare their facilities and to find the most environmentally friendly options for you. Some of these sites will also give money to environmental groups every time you make a booking. You can even choose who gets the money, which is great.

Other sites do even more and only work with hotels that try to balance out their negative effects on the environment and work to reduce their CO<sub>2</sub>. 4 They also give travellers the chance to give their hotel accommodation a score depending on how 'green' they think it really is.

Flying is, of course, one of the worst things for the environment and you'll never completely offset the carbon it produces. But at the same time, you want to see the world and also to save money when you fly, don't you? The only way to try to fly sustainably is to use special sites that really look for the greenest, quickest and cheapest flights available. 5 But you have to be honest with yourself. Unless the technology completely changes, perhaps the only real way to fly sustainably is not to fly at all.

2 Now complete the Exam Task.

Exam TASK
