August 1985: The worst month for air disasters

There are many grim landmarks in the history of aviation. One in particular stands out.

Three decades ago, 720 travellers and crew lost their lives on board commercial aircraft in a single month - more than in any other before or since.

The deaths occurred in four separate accidents in August 1985. Each disaster had quite different causes. The aircraft involved ranged from a 747 with hundreds on board to a tiny twin engine turboprop carrying just eight people.

There was Japan Airlines flight 123, the worst single-aircraft accident in history, in which 520 of 524 on board were killed. A further 137 died when Delta flight 191 flew into heavy winds as it approached Dallas-Fort Worth International. A fire on board British Airtours flight 28M at Manchester Airport led to 55 deaths. And all those on board the smallest aircraft, Bar Harbor Airlines flight 1808, lost their lives as it flew into a small airport in Maine, USA.

Each, in their own way, had a lasting legacy, whether in the memories of those left bereaved or in changes in technology and procedure introduced as a direct result. The worst death toll was on Japan Airlines Flight 123, a Boeing 747, which was route from Tokyo to Osaka on 12 August 1985 when the airtight bulkhead between its cabin and tail tore was opened. The change in pressure blew off the vertical stabilizer, or tail fin. It also destroyed the hydraulic systems. The plane lurched up and down.

Multilingual: what it is like to speak many languages

Today, over 50% of the world's total population can speak more than one language. Maybe you are one of these people who can communicate in many languages. However, it may be likely that you can speak more than Richard Doner, an American teenager who can hold a conversation in over twenty languages.

Richard lives in New York. It is a city where there are people from hundreds of different countries. There are around 180 languages spoken in New York schools. This is why Richard believes that New York is the perfect city for him. "I can discuss many different topics with people from all over the world and I don't even need to travel to another country," Richard says.

Can he see a disadvantage? "You can never rest. You have to continuously practice and put in lots of effort all the time to be able to remember the languages. I believe that, if your brain doesn't do any work, you can forget what you know. I don't have time to speak all of my languages every day, so if I want to get better, if I want to make progress, the important thing is that I speak each one as often as I can. If I don't, I start to forget the phrases and words that I know".

Richard is very popular all over the world. There are lots of video online of him practicing his skills in a wide range of languages, such as Arabic, Mandarin, German and even Swahili – language that is common in West Africa.

The most important thing for Richard is to have fun when he learns a language, Learning is easier if you can make it interesting for yourself, he explains. "Also, take your time – you have to learn at a speed that works for you. I don't think many would disagree with him!
