She continued to dry, the baby's ass, between the creases of his thighs, behind his knees and toes. Before dressing the child, Carmen, imitating her father, began to tickle Kiko and went over to kiss him on the belly. He let out a laugh so loud that it made the three of them laugh too, and Carmen kept kissing him over and over again. Suddenly, as if it were a fountain, the boy peed and sprayed so high that it splashed his sister.

PUF! He's on me! - said the girl moving away from the baby.
"Another day he waits for us to put him in a diaper," said his parents, amused.

That day, Carmen learned the parts of the human body, and not to approach her little brother to tickle until he had his diaper on.

Carmen watched as her mother prepared the bath for her little brother. Soon his father ip arrived with the child in his arms. He skillfully stripped him naked, then grabbed him under his arms and put him in the wat. When he began to pour water over his head, the baby smiled at the three of them.

"Kiko likes the bath," said Carmen, with her rag tongue, when she saw the look on his face.

It's important not to leave moisture on your neck - I told him when I got to that part.

"The breast, the belly," he kept saying, tickling the boy's belly.

"The arms, the hands, the fingers," his father continued.

"This is the head," she said as she gently, dired the boy's hair. Here are the ears and ears, whit which we can hear. The eyes, with which we can see. The nose, with which we can smell. In the mouth are the lips, teeth and tongue that allow us to taste and know if the food is tasty. Kiko only has two teeth because he's a baby.
