I used to have a Korean friend when I was in primary school. Her name is Kim Eun Byeol. She was beautiful and very humble. However, when I first met her, I didn't see those qualities in her because she seemed to be very intimidating and nobody really wanted to play with her. It might be because of the fact that she was from a different country with a different physical appearance. As a child, the other children and I used to have many misunderstandings about foreign people, or maybe were just afraid to make mistakes if we tries to talk to them.

As time went by, I steeled myself to approach her first and tried to have a conversation with her. I was quite surprised to find that she could talk Indonesian just fine. Little did I know, she was actually struggling to make friends because she didn't have enough courage to approach anyone first. She was always sad and confused. All this time, I though she didn't really want to make friends, so starting from that day, we become friends.

I introduced her to other children in the class. At first, everyone was reluctant and unsure about being friends with Eun Byeol, but got used to it anyway. Eun Byeol, who used to be very shy and quiet, started to show her real cheerful self. We had so much fun playing and studying together almost everyday. Unfortunately, when she got to middle school, she moved back to Korea and I never met her again.
