"Migrant Mother"

The image of an exhausted, desperate looking woman with two children on her shoulders and another in her lap, has become a photographic icon of the Great Depression in America. Dorothea Lange took this photo – "Migrant Mother" – in March 1936 at a camp for agricultural workers 175 miles north of Los Angeles. Lange was immediately attracted to the woman and took six photos. The woman was the mother of seven children and she was about to die of hunger.

After she returned home, Lange told the editor of a San Francisco newspaper about the conditions of the workers at the camp, showing him the photos. The editor informed the authorities and published an article that included Lange's images. The result was that the government sent 10,000 kilos of food to the camp. The photos also influenced John Steinbeck in the writing of his famous novel The Grapes of Wrath.

In 1960, Dorothea Lange described her experience in an interview with the magazine Popular Photography. "After working for a month, I was driving back home when I saw a sign: 'Pea Pickers Camp'. Something made me postpone my journey home and enter the camp," Dorothea explained. "The woman was sitting in a tent with her children around her. She told me she was 32. She was living on frozen vegetables from the fields and birds that the children killed," Dorothea said. "She seemed to know that my pictures could help her, and so she helped me."
