Bamboo Basketry

Bamboo grows wild throughout Thailand, and for centuries it's tough, pliable stalks have been deftly woven into a wide variety of object that combine utility with often remarkable artistic expression. Every country household contains examples of these, used in almost every aspect of daily life. As one writer on the subject has ancestral customs and habits of an ordinary, forgotten people. Each intricately woven basket has it own particular shape and function.

The techniques, ranging from the delicate and grateful to the rustic and bold, were born rural necessity and handed down from generation to generation. No brief account could encompass all the different baskets produced in Thailand, but certain types are repeated over and over, in nearly or fish trap, an elegant, ingenious device for catching fish in the shadow water along the edge of a rice field. Once caught, the fish are put for safekeeping in another, tightly woven basket called a Khong, which rests on four supports and has a narrow opening at the top of ; some Khongs are also fitting with a cone-shaped insert made of bamboo to keep the fish from jumping out. Yet another familiar basket is the multi-purpose -grajad, used for carrying rice or other produce. This is shallow and has wide mouth which is often adorned with decorative edging--sometimes in a style quaintly called " take the girl by the hand" meaning that the closely interlocked weaving leads the eye around the rim. A flatter version of this basket, called grajad mon, is commonly carried on a pole or on the hip. Glutinous rice is a stable food in both the north and the northeast, and farmers carry a supply of it with them for lunch when they go to work in the fields. A wide range of baskets have been devised for the purpose, always covered and footed, with a cord attached so that it can be easily carried over the shoulder. Many of these have handsome geometric designs in darker bamboo woven into them. There are also special baskets for measuring and carrying coconuts., for winnowing rice, for transportation pigs to market, for rearing silkworms, for storing clothes and other possessions, for packaging charcoal--in brief, for just about every need that might arise. All therefore, are basically utilitarian; but in beauty of workmanship and design many also deserve to be elevated to the category of true folk art.
