V. Read the passage and tick True or False.

When I first went to Britain, a lot of things seemed strange to me. There were the obvious ones like people driving on the left and the way most people carried an umbrella all the time, but there were other things that I found really surprising.

The first thing I noticed was how polite people were. When I got on the bus, the driver would greet me and when people got off, they would say "Thank you" to the driver. When I went into a shop, I would immediately be greeted by a smiling sales assistant who would say "Can I help you?"

The family I stayed with were very nice, but their house was full of oddities. Firstly, there were carpets everywhere, even in the bathroom. In fact, the bathroom was full of surprises. The first time I tried to wash my hands, I burned myself. The cold and hot water comes out of different taps! Then, when I tried to dry my hair, I couldn't find a socket to plug my hairdryer into. Maybe this isn't such a big surprise. More surprising was the fact that people didn't take their shoes off when they went into a house - can you imagine?

I guess that for British people, all of these things are normal. It's only when you visit a foreign country that you realize that what you think is normal is not. Normality depends on where you are.
