Interviewer: How often do you go climbing?

Julia: As often as I can. People sometimes think that rock climbers spend all their time hanging from a wall of rock high above the earth, but that ¹won't be / is not actually true. Most serious rock climbers like me ²spend / tend to spend a lot of time at the gym. I go there almost every day after work. I climb, of course, but I also run, lift weights, and do other strength training. To increase my endurance, I'll go up a climbing wall, which takes me around forty minutes, and then I'll climb back down and rest.

I: How often ³do you / do you tend to climb real rock?

J: On weekends, ⁴I meet / I'll meet with friends and take a bus or train to a good place to practice outdoor climbing. There are good places to climb as close as fifteen minutes from my house, but ⁵we'll travel / we travel as far as three hours some days.

I: Do you ever push yourself too hard?

J: One thing I've learned is that it's important to listen to your body. On days when ⁶I'll feel / I feel like I need to rest, I rest. Rock climbing is dangerous, and accidents ⁷tend to happen / happen more often when you are tired. The last time I was too tired to climb, but decided to go anyway, I came home in pretty bad shape, covered in scratches and bruises.

I: Any advice to less experienced rock climbers?

J: If you ⁸are / will be careful, most accidents can be easily avoided. Make sure to check your equipment carefully. One simple mistake can be the difference between a safe climb and serious injury. For example, I always check everything twice—and then I ask my climbing partner to check it a third time. I ⁹tend to meet / meet young, inexperienced climbers who think it's not cool to follow this type of procedure, but there is nothing cool about getting badly injured.
