Reading

1 Read the text about an interesting job.

We're in Amsterdam by a quiet canal. 1 Is he trying to find fish for his dinner? Not exactly. He's looking for bicycles. This is because he's a bike fisher. Amsterdam has got a lot of canals, around 100 kilometres in all. 2 In fact, there are actually more bikes than people in Amsterdam. Whilst they're a useful way of getting around, when they end up in the canal, they can be a real problem for the many boats operating in the city.

In the 1960s, people started to fish for bikes and remove them from the canals. 3 They have to do a two-week training course before starting. They learn a lot of things in this time, including how to look for and pick up the bikes correctly. Bike fishers can really help the environment because the metal from the bikes can be recycled and reused.

The man on the boat is now pulling two dirty old bikes out of the water. 4 This means they can be sold to a bike shop rather than go to a recycling centre. The sale of the bikes gives the city extra money to spend on other services. Fishing for bikes is a calm and relaxing job, just like the more traditional hobby. 5 The bike fishers are generally busier in winter. There aren't many tourists around at this time, so there are fewer boats on the canals. This means the fishers have more time to search the water more carefully and find more bikes.
