Task 2: Read and choose True or False

People have begun to use computer networks to exchange personal ads. But in San Francisco, the home of many innovative ideas, personal ads have gone two steps ahead. Now they are not just electronic – they are public. More then twenty cafés in the Bay Area, as the greater San Francisco area is called, are connected to a computer system called SFNet.

Users can communicate with each other even if they are miles apart. The computer screen is installed in the tops of low tables in the cafés, with a keyboard for typing messages just below. Users buy coffee at the counter, then spend time on the computer by inserting money into the machine, the user can then use the network to chat or argue with people they may or may not meet. Regulars use the system to pick up messages left for them.

You can enter into debate about subjects such as politics, astrology...

Some people feel that users, with their heads bent over the computer screens, ruin the social atmosphere in a café. But many say it is a perfect way to overcome natural shyness and make new friends. Some people have "conversations" for months before deciding to meet. And the café provides the computer network that most people cannot afford to have at home.

Not all conversations on the network are personal. Many are purely commercial, between people with things to buy or sell.
