

'People still tell me, "Children don't read nowadays",' says Eden Ramsey. The truth is that they are skilled, creative readers. When I do classroom visits, they ask me very sophisticated questions about the use of language, story structure, chapters, and dialogue.'

'A few years ago, publishers lost confidence and wanted to make books more like television, the medium that frightened them most,' says children's book critic Julia Eccleshare. 'But books aren't TV, and you will find that children always say that the good thing about books is that you can see them in your head. Children are demanding readers,' she says. 'If they don't get it in two pages, they'll drop it.'

No more are children's authors considered mere sentimentalists or failed adult writers. 'Some feted adult writers would kill for the sales,' says David Almond, who sold 42,392 copies of the children's book Skellig in 1999 alone.
