In most countries, the address format includes a street name, a house number, a postal code, which also comes in different formats depending on the country, and the name of the area.

Several countries include the names of administrative areas on global addresses to help sort the mail and correct possible mistakes. It is the case, for instance, in the USA, where the state abbreviation is required (cần phải, phải có) on a mail address next to the city. Other countries like Brazil, Italy, and Mexico use similar abbreviations for administrative areas, while in Spain and South Korea, the Province is written in full on a separate line.
