Globalization

Economists who support globalization often point to the drop in world poverty it has brought about over the last two decades. Life expectancy is up, 2 billion more people now have access to clean water, and deaths from preventable diseases like TB, malaria, and measles are down. Death rates for infants and mothers have also seen a reduction, as have numbers of underweight children. Yet in the West, things are not so rosy, and could even be said to be taking the opposite course. Between the end of the Second World War and the beginning of the eighties, income for the bottom 20% in society increased at a greater rate than that of the top 20%. Since 1980, their income has hardly increased at all, while that of the top 20% carried on increasing steadily. Today, over half of US wealth is in the hands of just 3% of the population, and America is less equal than the Philippines in those terms. Those that blame jobs going overseas for these ills are shooting wide of the mark. Domestic companies are also cutting wages, and at the same time corporate profits are through the roof. Indices of poverty such as infant mortality are on the rise once again. The American Dream of rising out of a life on the breadline, struggling week to week to pay rent and utilities, to education, wealth and a middle-class life, are more unattainable than practically ever before. There are a number of theories as to where this trend will end up. It could all seem to point to the fact that as the wealth of a country rises, it only benefits all areas of society for a limited period of time. Another theory says that the trend will continue until all countries have reached a similar level of wealth. Nobody, however, seems at all confident that things will improve for the USA – or other countries of the West – any time soon.
