

Last Saturday, I went to the park with my friends, and we had a wonderful time. The weather was sunny but not too hot, which made it perfect for outdoor activities. We arrived at 10 AM, and the first thing we did was play soccer. The game was intense but fun because everyone tried their best. After an hour, we decided to take a break because we were tired, and it was getting warmer.

While we rested under a big tree, we talked about our plans for the afternoon. Some of us wanted to go swimming, but others preferred to stay in the park and have a picnic. We couldn't decide whether to swim or stay, so we voted on it. In the end, we chose to stay in the park because it was more relaxing.

We spent the afternoon eating sandwiches, listening to music, and playing board games. Everyone was laughing, and we had a great time. Before we left, we walked around the park one last time to enjoy the scenery. It was a perfect day with friends, and I hope we can do it again next weekend.

What was the weather like at the park?

What did the group do first after arriving at the park?

Why did they take a break after playing soccer?

How did they decide whether to swim or have a picnic?

What activities did they do in the afternoon?