Do you ever have a <sup>1</sup> _____ in your chest? Have you ever broken a bone or dislocated your shoulder?' Actually, I had lots of accidents when I was a child. For example, when I was 10, I fell out of a tree. The doctors decided to put a <sup>2</sup> _____ on my both legs and I couldn't walk for a long time. I didn't mind as I stayed at home and had plenty of time to watch TV. My mother was really angry and would repeat, 'It wouldn't have happened if you <sup>3</sup> _____ to me.' Of course my friends just laughed their <sup>4</sup> _____ off and told me how careless I was! I am a lot more careful than I used to be, and the worst thing that's happened to me lately is being <sup>5</sup> _____ by a dog, which certainly wasn't my fault. I did go to the doctor for a tetanus injection, but that was my first visit in about three years.

READING

8 Read the texts. For questions 1–4 choose the correct option A–D.

Text 1

With all of the advances in medical science, you would think that humans would be healthier than ever. This is especially true in countries where access to the latest therapies is easily available.

So why do people seem to be suffering more and more from allergies and food-related illnesses? You may wonder if this is because people think too much about their health, but the numbers say otherwise. According to the World Health Organization, asthma has increased by a surprising amount, and about four per cent of the US population has a food allergy. This has everything to do with the way we live in today's mostly urban world. Very young children's bodies can't fight infections until they have to deal with bacteria, the thing which causes disease. Their first cold or ear infection trains the body to fight the next one. It turns out that people who grow up in clean urban environments have less ability to fight germs because they don't come across them. Children who grow up on farms, around animals, or in families with many children have a lot more contact with germs. As a result, their bodies are better able to cope, and they are less likely to become allergic.

We may have to rethink our attitude towards germs. It might be better to let children get down in the dirt, and to stop using germ-killing chemicals in our homes. If we want to slow down the increase in allergies, maybe we need to get a little dirty.

1 The author's general conclusion about allergies is that

- A we need to accept them as a part of life.
- B the way we live has changed the types of allergies we get.
- C they were more common at times in the past.
- D our way of life is making them more common.

2 To help prevent a further increase in allergies, we may have to

- A return to life in the countryside.
- B give children more protection from germs.
- C give up cleaning our homes.
- D accept that germs are necessary.

Text 2

As a child, I was pretty fearless. I used to climb trees, walk through overgrown fields and – maybe foolishly – see how many bees I could catch in a single jar. This idiotic activity became a fun game among friends. The person with the fullest jar won, and then we'd let the bees go and watch them fly away. Of course we got stung once or twice, but that was just part of the game.

The first time I reacted to a sting was when I was hiking with my family through some woods. I accidentally stepped into a wasps' nest. I got several stings, and – as my mother describes it – I almost immediately began to go red and swollen. Evidently my face looked like a basketball, and the last thing I remember is fighting to catch my breath as my throat began to close.

I was very lucky. A passing couple, one of whom had a bee allergy, immediately recognised the symptoms. The woman gave me an injection of epinephrine, which she always carried with her in case of an allergic reaction. They then phoned an ambulance. The next thing I knew I was waking up in hospital with my family around me, all of them looking extremely relieved. And I had a sense of thankfulness which has stayed with me.

The lesson? Allergies can develop over time, so don't assume you can't react to something just because you haven't before. And always be prepared.

- C was afraid of many things.
