Farming around the world

In many countries, farmers are getting older and few young people are becoming farmers when older farmers stop working at the end of their career. However, technology is helping with this problem because, with new farming machines, farmers do not have to work so hard and fewer people can do the same work. But farming still needs more young people.

Average age of farmers
Japan	Kenya	The UK
67	60	59

Farming is hard work and involves long working hours with early starts and late finishes to the day. Also, young people all believe the same thing: it will be hard to make much money from farming.

The number of old farmers to every young farmer
Cyprus	The UK	The Netherlands	Greece
33	13	8	7

In Kenya, Mary Nyale, who works on the Farm Africa's Growing Futures project, is trying to change young people's ideas about farming. Mary is doing this because over 80% of Kenya's population are younger than 35 years old. Also, around one in four young people do not have a job. Through the programme, young people learn how to grow things like French beans, tomatoes and cabbage. These are what are called high-value crops because you get the most money for them. The young people also learn about farming as a business. And they meet buyers on the programme, so that when they finish the course, they have someone that will buy their vegetables.

Since the project started in 2011, over 4,000 young people have become farmers. The money the farmers get has also increased by 50% in two years.
