- (A) At this point, Beatrice revealed her secret to Guasconti.
- (B) However, rather than curing her, the medicine killed her.
- (C) Despite the danger, Guasconti could not resist entering the garden to meet Beatrice.
- (D) She lived in a house with a garden featuring many poisonous plants from distant lands.
- (E) Beatrice, on the other hand, not only remained unharmed but also seemed to have a connection with the plants.

A young man named Giovanni Guasconti had recently arrived in Padua from the south of Italy to study at the city's university. From the window of the room which he rented, he could often see a beautiful young girl who lived next door. 1. The garden belonged to her father, a scientist named Giacomo Rappaccini. Rappaccini did experiments with the plants in the garden to create special medicines.

The girl was called Beatrice. As Guasconti watched Beatrice from his room, he began to notice something curious. Any animals that entered the garden would die from being too close to the poisonous plants. 2.

Guasconti developed romantic feelings for Beatrice and wanted to meet her. However, Pietro Baglioni, a professor at the university, advised Guasconti to stay away, warning him that Rappaccini was a dangerous man.

Nevertheless, Guasconti later met Beatrice. But as he spent time in her garden, he started to see changes in his body, and he believed that the garden's poisons were slowly killing him. 3. Because she had been around the plants from birth, they had no effect on her; also, she herself was poisonous to other living things.

Knowing that being with Beatrice would kill him, Guasconti returned to Professor Baglioni for advice. Baglioni gave him a medicine that he claimed would cure Beatrice of her harmful nature. Guasconti persuaded Beatrice to take the medicine. 4. As she died in Guasconti's arms, her father watched on, realizing that in pursuit of his scientific achievements, he had sacrificed his only daughter.

Lesson 3

People in different countries have their own ideas of what makes someone beautiful. Let's learn about the beauty standards in East Asia, Africa, and Myanmar.

In countries of East Asia like China, Japan, and South Korea, many people think that having pale skin is beautiful. They believe that having pale skin means you take good care of yourself. Some even eat special foods, like soups made with white herbal medicines, to make their skin lighter. In addition, people in East Asia often stay out of the sun to keep their skin pale.

In some parts of Africa, such as Ethiopia, people have a different idea of beauty. Some women from the Mursi tribe wear large plates in their lower lips. These lip plates are a sign of maturity and beauty. The bigger the plate, the more beautiful the woman is seen to be. This tradition is important to their culture, but women are not forced to follow it. They can decide whether they would like to wear a lip plate or not.

In Myanmar, a country in Southeast Asia, some women wear rings around their necks to make them longer. The Kayan people believe that a longer neck is beautiful. Girls start wearing these rings when they are very young. The rings can be heavy, but they are part of their tradition.

Beauty standards are different all around the world, and they show how people in different places see beauty in unique ways.

Famous short-story author O. Henry was very productive—he published nearly six hundred short stories. His works reflect his wide range of experiences and show his talent for creating unexpected endings. However, like many other writers, O. Henry engaged in a variety of other activities and professions before he set his mind on being a short-story writer.

First, after working at his uncle's drugstore, he became a licensed pharmacist* at the age of nineteen. At that time, he also started sketching townspeople who often visited the store. His drawing skills were admired for their creativity and expressiveness.

Next, in March 1882, O. Henry moved to Texas, where he lived on a sheep ranch* and learned how to babysit, cook, and take care of animals. He became a fine musician there as well, being very skilled at playing both the guitar and the mandolin*.

After working at the ranch, O. Henry then took on a number of different jobs. In 1891, he began to work in a bank as a teller*. However, he was quite careless with his bookkeeping*. Thus, in 1894, he was accused of stealing money, leading to his dismissal from the bank. Later, in 1895, O. Henry moved to Houston and began contributing to the Houston Post as a reporter and columnist.

O. Henry's journey to becoming a celebrated short-story author was marked by a diverse array of experiences and professions. Despite facing challenges, O. Henry's strength and creativity flourished, shaping him as a successful writer. Ultimately, O. Henry's life illustrates how diverse paths can lead to a remarkable destination.
