On the road again

The rise of the digital nomad

- A. Remote working has ballooned in recent years, with research in 2020 finding that 10.9 million Americans classed themselves as digital nomads, an increase of 49% in the previous year. It used to be that the stereotype of the digital nomad was a 20-something enjoying the view of the beach from behind their laptop, or reclining on a coffee shop sofa with various electronics in the process of charging. However, with the rise in remote working jobs and families having become well versed in the art of balancing their children's education with their own work demands due to the pandemic, more families are now choosing to take to the road. In a survey of 1,400 people across 67 nationalities, 54% identified themselves as being able to work anywhere and a surprising 70% were parents who took their children with them.
- B. Sarah Hawley founded the website Growmately which matches professionals who want to work remotely to employers who need them. She and her husband, Joe, both had a great love of travel before their son Luka was born. They spend around two months at a time travelling the US in their camper van and in August they will head for Sarah's native Australia as well as Bali in Indonesia. They hope that by travelling, Luka will develop a cross-cultural understanding of the world and see that there are various approaches to how things are done, as well as giving him an innate sense of curiosity about the world.
- C. Another nomadic family are Joel and Jenna Young and their three boys all aged between eight and 14. They both grew up in rural Ohio with few opportunities for travel, with Joel not venturing on to a plane until the age of 17. They now spend up to six months each year touring in their motorhome with the intention of giving their boys experiences that they didn't have growing up. They hope it will increase cultural awareness and give them an enhanced learning experience. 'We want our kids to have the benefit of seeing it all ... it just leads to a better level of decision making, says Joel of the family's travel.
- D. Critics, however, warn of the negatives of this lifestyle choice. Dr Jody LeVos, a Child Development expert points out that it removes the comfort of routine and the wider support network from the child's life, potentially having a detrimental effect on the child. She warns that if their social circle, physical environment and the time zones they find themselves in are constantly changing, children can lose a sense of familiarity which they crave. There's also the risk that unless they have a dedicated family member or tutor to structure their education, they are at risk of falling behind students attending school.
- E. Sarah Hawley is aware of these risks and employs a nanny who often travels with them to home-school Luka. When this isn't possible, she will work while Joe looks after their son and vice versa. As far as possible, they try and stick to a familiar routine even as they travel around and will go to bed at the same time regardless of location. They also have a community of friends who travel too and they try to stay close to them adding to the sense of a constant social circle. As more people reassess what they want from work and education, it's likely we will see even more families take to the road and a more nomadic lifestyle will become increasingly normalised.

8 Extended activity/Homework

Read the question.

Parents travelling with their children for long periods of time is harmful for their development. You can't replace school with travelling around from place to place as school involves learning a wide range of subjects, not just what is in front of them.

To what extent do you agree with the above statement?

You should:

- Write at least 250 words.
- Check your grammar, spelling and punctuation.
