People say that moving house is one of the most stressful things you can do, but the Anderson family didn't just move house, they moved continents. We talked to them about their experiences travelling the 7,000 miles from England to Indonesia.

So, why did they decide to move halfway around the world? Jenny Anderson loves animals and wanted to help protect them. She was studying for her PhD in Animal Conservation and was very interested in the orangutans of the Sumatran rainforest. 'I wrote lots of emails to an organisation there, asking questions for my research,' Jenny remembers. 'Then one day, they asked if I was interested in working with them. I was so surprised!' Of course, she wanted to go, but she had to think about her family first. Len, her husband, was working in a job he enjoyed. He was an engineer for a large oil company. They also had two children: Keira who was six, and Ben who was four. But Len knew that this was a fantastic opportunity for Jenny. After some thought, he decided he'd quite like to explore somewhere new and interesting. 'Let's do it,' he said

Was it very different in Indonesia? 'Of course, it was so much hotter than the UK,' says Jenny. 'It was 25 degrees Celsius even in the wet season. And the rain was the heaviest I've ever seen.' The house where they were living was on a street which flooded when it rained, and it rained a lot. They sometimes had to walk in water up to their knees when they went out shopping. 'We didn't have hot water and there was no shower,' says Len. 'We had to fill a bucket with water and use that to wash.' They wondered if they had made a big mistake in leaving their lovely home in England. They even had a few conversations about returning. 'Everything was so different,' says Jenny. 'The roads were more crowded, the food was spicier and everywhere was louder than we were used to.'

So, did they regret their decision to move to the other side of the world? 'Not at all,' says Len. 'After a couple of weeks, we began to enjoy the differences. The people are much friendlier here than in the United Kingdom. They are so interested in our lives.' Jenny agrees, 'Yes, the Indonesians are the nicest people I've ever met. And I love my job, too. Keira and Ben are growing up near the rainforest and see orangutans, elephants and monkeys all the time. Their friends back home enjoy seeing photos of the animals.'

They aren't planning to move back to England yet, then? 'Not yet,' says Jenny. 'But it is nice to go home for a visit sometimes.'

- 1 There are four members of the Anderson family. _____
- 2 Jenny was looking for work with orangutans. _____
- 3 Len was unsure about moving to Indonesia. _____
- 4 It took a long time for them to like where they were living. _____
