In almost all big cities, crime has been a hotly topic. Some the view that crime is primarily the consequences of social inequality, others opine that personal choice plays a more significant role. There are compelling on both sides of the debate, which will be thoroughly in the paragraphs.

On the one hand, it is argued that crime stems mainly from social inequality.

First and foremost, there is a argument that poverty often drives individuals to commit crimes. For those who are unemployed or struggling financially may resort to theft or drug trafficking as a desperate means of survival. In addition, of this view out that unequal access to education and employment opportunities can push people toward illegal activity. That is because individuals without education and work may feel marginalized or hopeless about their future, and as a they may perceive crime as the only viable path to a better life.

On the other hand, some believe that personal responsibility is the main cause of crime. First of all, there is a widespread that everyone has the ability to distinguish right from wrong, of their background. For example, many individuals from disadvantaged environments still manage to lead honest and law-abiding lives, which suggests that crime is not a(n) outcome of poverty.

Furthermore, some proponents that criminals often make conscious and deliberate choices to break the law for personal gain, than being driven by necessity. This highlights the importance of individual values, moral reasoning, and the influence of one's upbringing and choices.

In conclusion, it is true that crime has been a matter of great I am that while social inequality can act as a contributing factor, personal choice ultimately plays a more decisive role.
