The End of Exams?

High school students in Stamford, Connecticut, USA, will not be taking midterm and final exams this year. School officials were concerned about the amount of valuable class time teachers spend (1) (coach) kids for the exams in addition to the three or four days it takes (2) (administer) them. Moreover, many believe it is possible (3) (do) well in the exams without (4) (acquire) an in-depth understanding of the material. In light of these concerns, the city has decided (5) (suspend) midterm and final exams.

The decision has upset many parents, who only learned about it from social media. They are angry at (6) (not consult) before the change was implemented and would like (7) (know) how their children will be assessed instead. Some parents say that unless they actually see their children (8) (study) for exams, they worry that they will not be adequately prepared for university. However, some educators argue that (9) (learn) through projects and presentations will better prepare students for the real world, as opposed to the one-and-done test environment.
