In the world of social media, TikTok is relatively new. But since its creation in 2016, it's quickly climbed the charts when it comes to popularity. Data shows TikTok has about 1.2 billion active users every month, which is more than X and Instagram. The people who use it tend to spend more than an hour a day on it.

"The way TikTok is set up to have really brief, really intense, and easily available engagement in videos adds to that dopamine release and that inconsistent but always available input into your brain" said Mary Gabriel, a child and adolescent psychiatrist for University Hospitals. She said she had noticed the impact the app had had on her patients. "You set constant feedback in the form of likes, comments and notifications. I mean, those frequent, but inconsistent feedback are the combination that reinforces a behavior," Gabriel said.

In many cases, the app as a whole adds to the peer pressure children can face at school. Gabriel believes it's a big reason why she is seeing more kids these days either facing depression or anxiety-related issues. There is science behind the impact. Gabriel points to one area of the brain that usually doesn't become fully developed until people reach their mid-20s. Until then, she said their decision-making process may not be as logical or as rational, leading them to be more vulnerable to be influenced by what they see on the app.
