A Day in the Life of a UFRJ Student

Lucas Pereira, who studies engineering at the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro (UFRJ), describes a typical day for a university student in Brazil.

Lucas usually wakes up at 6:30 a.m. because his classes start early.

He lives with his parents in Niterói, so he takes the bus to the university every morning. The journey takes about one hour, so he often listens to music or reads a book on the way.

At UFRJ, Lucas has classes from Monday to Friday. He studies different subjects, such as mathematics, physics, and computer science. He always tries to pay attention during lectures and takes notes to help him study later. Sometimes, he has group projects and meets his classmates in the library to work together.

Lucas usually brings his lunch from home, but when he forgets, he eats at the university cafeteria. He prefers to eat with his friends because they talk about their classes and help each other with homework.

In the afternoon, Lucas has laboratory classes or extra activities. He is a member of the university's robotics club, so he participates in meetings and competitions. He also volunteers at a local community center, where he teaches math to children.

After a long day, Lucas returns home around 7:00 p.m. He has dinner with his family and then studies for a few more hours. He always tries to go to bed before midnight, so he feels rested for the next day.
