

Mexico City Offers Resting Point for Caravan

Over 4,000 migrants from [redacted] America have made it to a rest stop at a sports [redacted] in Mexico City where they are receiving water, food, and [redacted]. The first wave in the caravan left eastern Honduras on October 13 and many, including small children, have walked most of the way on foot. After travelling over 1,600 kilometers, the migrants consider Mexico City a major milestone. The goal of the migrants is to reach the US in hopes of finding [redacted] opportunities and a safer place to live. President Trump, however, has called the caravan an invasion and has threatened to close the US-Mexico border to prevent the migrants from entering the US. Some of the migrants say they will seek asylum in Mexico instead. Two more groups are following close behind and should arrive in Mexico's [redacted] in the next few days.
