

School in India Uses Cardboard Boxes to Prevent Cheating

A school in India is facing backlash over an anti-cheating experiment involving [redacted] boxes. Students at Bhagat Pre-University College were invited to bring in their own boxes to wear on their heads while taking an exam. The school said that parents were informed and students were not [redacted] to participate in the anti-cheating trial. When photos of the test takers were shared over social media, the school agreed to put an end to the experiment. [redacted] is a major problem in many schools in India where students are often pressured to receive top marks in order to gain entrance to [redacted]. Other efforts to prevent cheating in India have included installing cameras, hiring police officers to monitor examination rooms, and requiring the [redacted] of socks and shoes.