

Insert missing expressions. Choose from:

drop out of college

take up a trade

make up one's mind

pay off loans

miss out on an opportunity

take out loans

rack up the debt

think over one's options

set up a business

deal with pressure

The Road Less Traveled

When Jason in his second year, many of his friends thought he was making a huge mistake. While they were preparing for midterms, he was already trying to He realized he wasn't passionate about his major and didn't want to just to end up in a job he hated.

After months of uncertainty, he finally: instead of going back to university, he would He started training to become an electrician - a profession that, to his surprise, offered both stability and good income. Although some people criticized his decision, Jason knew he hadn't; he had simply chosen a different path.

While his former classmates were still studying and, Jason was already working and beginning to from his brief time at college. The best part?

He had a long-term goal. With enough experience, he planned to of his own.

Of course, nothing came easy. Jason had to from clients, meet tight deadlines, and constantly prove his skills. But he never regretted his decision. In the end, taking a risk and trusting his instincts helped him build a life that truly suited him.